Notes From My Conversation with Madeleine:

(We were not able to meet online, so here are our emails.)

Madeleine:

"I just have a couple questions:

- 1) Because I've never used Tumblr before, would you mind explaining a bit more about how the layout looks like?
- 2) Is there a certain color scheme and typography choice you had in mind?"

Noelle:

Hi Madeleine,

Here are a few websites of interest for tumblr examples

<https://jewishdragon.tumblr.com/post/115134138636/poem-by-a-jewish-trans-woman-written-in-1322>(ignore the tiled gif background, I would not like that)

<https://www.tumblr.com/orwell>

<https://www.tumblr.com/ceeejus>

This general kind of layout.

As far as typography goes, I would like a sort of fun display text almost like you'd see in a comic or cut out shapes, and a more neutral, perhaps newspaper like body text.

The websites I attached in the creative brief are also good examples of aesthetics."

Madeleine:

"Sounds good! Thank you for the helpful info/references."

"So sorry for the late notice, but I just had a couple of questions about your webpages for your site.

I noticed that a lot of the pages you wanted require information outside of the Wikipedia page itself. For instance, I couldn't really find information in the Wikipedia page on Application and Relevance to Zine Culture, Smell of Alcohol Ink of Printed Mimeos in Gen X's Adolescence, or on How to Print at Home.

I understand that you've linked a video for the How to Print at Home section, but I think for this project, we're supposed to stay within the scope of the actual Wikipedia page. Is there any content from the Wiki that you think would fit the pages you have in mind?"

Noelle

"I definitely went too overboard. As for the How to print section, paraphrase information from the Preparing stencils section, maybe footnote that page with information from Contemporary use.

As far as the gallery goes, that can be replaced with the Uses and art section from the wiki."
